SYNOPSIS. "A GOOD DINNER."

The distracting scene of this play describing the difficulties of a young married couple is in their room in the suburbs of New York.

The trouble starts when Mrs. Callender, because of urgent social engagements, does not do her own marketing, but writes a list of articles needed for dinner on blue paper on the other side of which is the address of another family living at a distance. The order goes there, and the Callenders can secure only a canned dinner. The consternation of Mrs. Callender and the cook can be imagined when they discover that Mr. Callender has invited to dinner a couple of distinguished Englishmen who are on a business trip.

Confusion reigns till Mrs. Callender, with the help of the cook and maids, borrows a dinner of a neighbor. Even though this dinner is very simple compared with the feast which was planned, it saves the day, both for Mr. Callender as a business man, and Mrs. Callender as a hostess.
