

Red River Aggie

JUNIOR CLASS

The class of 1919 has completed two years of its course. The class is not so large as it was a year ago because of the draft. Many students have either been called to the service of our country, or else have had to take the places of brothers who have gone. Those who are left are trying to take advantage of their opportunities so that, if they are called for service, they may yet be an efficient help in the period of reconstruction.

The Junior class is progressive and far sighted. While newspapers are discussing a league of nations, the Junior class already represents such an organization on a small scale. They are composed of French, Norwegians, Swedes, Irish, Germans, and Scotch. After two years' association they are still conducting their affairs in peace and harmony. They have no armaments; they have no ill will toward other classes. They conduct their affairs in public sessions. They abide by the rules of the central organization and settle all disputes in the same manner.

Their interests are not always selfish. Members of this class have volunteered in the school band, literary societies, Christian associations, basket ball teams, and other interests of the great institution. They are developing their talents. They are learning citizenship, cooperation, progressiveness, unselfishness,—all of which will serve them in good degree when they become Seniors and when they finally graduate.

JUNIOR JINGLES

Olga Tunheim: I'm game for a feed tonight.

Hilda Nyquist: Oh, this old H. E. N. isn't scared of anything.

Lettie Rupert: Oh, you girls are so foolish.

Gerda Kulle: Central? Give me Fort Snelling, please.

Adelia Westphalen: Do we have an examination today?