THE Advanced Class is composed of a group of persons who, realizing that education is not completed by a diploma, have returned to their alma mater to enlarge upon their knowledge in the academic branches, in preparation for a school of higher learning. They realize that preparedness is the only guarantee of efficiency. They believe with Pope that "a little learning is a dangerous thing," and have taken it to mean that too many are satisfied with a mediocre plane of living. Today there is need of men who can perform a task a trifle better than other men, who, in trying to better their own station in life or in business, do not forget to educate or help someone to fill their places when their merits prove them worthy of promotion. By helping those with us, we are inversely applying the dictum, "Boost your superior, then take his place." With such a view toward life, and with such an attitude toward mutual helpfulness, obviously one will not be progressing with selfish motives, for he will be a stimulating example and help to those with whom he comes in contact in his daily life. A person with such ideals will be loyal to his country and will be rendering to mankind a service that will be reflected throughout the generations to come. Now since an education tends to promote such achievements, it is worth while that we avail ourselves of every opportunity to further our learning.
