

to the members of sixteen of the eighteen graduating classes, which includes all but 15 of the total number of graduates.

For after all, it is the students, the former-students and alumni, and not money, lands or buildings, that create an institution. It is equally true that an institution lives or dies in the hearts of its own members. In conclusion, I wish to say that I am sure the Northwest School alumni will measure up to this high standard and will loyally cooperate with hearts filled to overflowing to make the school a greater service institution as the years go by.

JUDGING LIVESTOCK