The Boy Scouts

The first Scout organization at the Northwest School was started when Melvin Burk, a Lone Scout, started the Northwest Eagle Fraternity in 1927. Melvin can be properly called a pioneer of scouting at the Northwest School. His little group consisted of energetic young folks from various sections of the Northwest who were determined to make a success of the undertaking.

With the addition of new students to the ranks of the Lone Scouts the organization was carried on from year to year. By taking a part in many of the activities they became a part of the school.

One of the little bits of history that will stay in the memory of a group of the scouts is an overnight hike they made one year near the close of the winter term.

This year through the influence of various faculty members of the Northwest School and the able assistance of the Scoutmaster Ocock and Scout Leader Olson, a Boy Scout Troop was organized. This was the first troop in the history of the Northwest School Scout organization.

The troop, called Troop Number 46, was installed with a fine sized group of boys promising a very good membership for the year.

Scoutmaster Ocock, to whom much credit was due, has started to drill the boys in scoutcraft with hopes that they will be able to participate in the scout contests at the Winter Crop Shows this year.

Scouting offers a program of very useful and interesting activities for an active boy. They learn many fine and useful things such as camping, first aid, safety rules, and in the study of nature they learn the value of the wild life.

Scouting develops the finest things in a boy's character, physically, mentally, and morally.
