Starting the 1940-41 season with only one regular returning from last year's team and confronted with a difficult schedule of twenty games, Coach Christgau had a huge task before him to mould out a winning combination. It was late in the season when the Aggies started to click and in the closing games were bringing much praise to themselves for their hard-fighting and determination. Several games were lost by the very closest margin possible—one point. Others were lost by two or three points. Despite a record that is none too impressive, the Aggies thrilled spectators with their playing, this being especially true in the games played during the second half of their schedule.
