

Characters

An author must draw on his imagination for his characters. In the Northwest School's true story they were real flesh and blood—almost four hundred youths congregated on the campus seeking self betterment. They had many things in common; yet they were as individuals distinct young boys and girls each playing his part both as individual and as one of the group. To sketch the year's student-characters is the place of this section.

