Membership in the National Honor Society is considered a mark of distinction. The first requirement for eligibility is high scholarship. A second requirement is character. The ideal of genuine worth should so dominate the thinking of the group that it would be an exception which proves the rule for a member to be criticized for lack of honesty, dependability, or even courtesy.

Leadership and service, the third and fourth requirements, are taken almost for granted. In school activities these two are often inseparable. Members of this group are expected to volunteer for service in all the varied school activities.

Students who belong to the Honor Society should hold their membership as a great honor and feel that their scholarship and activities must contribute something worth-while to the school.
