

Scene Two

A Day With Mortimer

Strange as it may seem, there is a portion of each day during this production that we must devote to class room studies. To illustrate the point we will take you on a tour with Mortimer, a typical senior student at the Northwest School.

At approximately 7:50 he falls out of bed and gets ready to make a mad dash to a hurried breakfast. He runs into the class room as the 8:15 bell rings. This is the English class where it isn't approved to say "this here" or a number of other similar misused words and phrases.

As the 9:00 bell rings, he charges out of class and slowly trudges down the stairs to history where he learns the history of America. There are a variety of classes the third period, but Mortimer is tired by this time so he stays in the same room for livestock management, with Mr. Fausch as the able instructor.

The next period he marches bravely across the hall to physics class, where he racks his brain trying to figure out what "x" means.

Since it's Wednesday, he carries his books to the dorm, collects his mail, and with great effort ascends the stairs to assembly. Since all boys like to eat, you will find
