

Mortimer after assembly in the pushing line at the dining hall.

After throwing a few snow balls, he goes to American literature class perhaps to study to become a great poet. Following this class, at last, he has a free period when he gladly goes to the dorm. One look at his room and he decides to shovel out the dirt. After chatting a few minutes, he runs over to Owen building to get his goggles on for welding and tries to locate a different pair of gloves because he couldn't use the ones he had burned the day before.

Welding class over—on to Aggie Inn to keep his date with Mable. Over cokes they chatter as they compare notes concerning the events of the day. Time slips away—result: ten points taken off for tardiness to boys' glee club; home management girls eat scorched potatoes and burned pork chops.

Mortimer gulps down his supper, picks up a couple candy bars at Aggie Inn, then dashes off to meet Mable at home economics. He drops her at girls' glee club and hurries off to basketball practice. Energy exhausted, Mortimer returns to Robertson where ice cream and studies are combined as he masters tomorrow's class assignments. Thus revitalized he joins in the water sports in the halls.

Meanwhile Mable, too, refreshed by ice cream, has finished her work, put her hair in pin curls and tucked herself into bed to dream of Mortimer and tomorrow's activities.

