SOCIAL SCIENCE

WORLD HISTORY

AMERICAN HISTORY

The panorama of history shows us man's struggles through time. One nation rises and lives victorious. Its grandeur and respect, however, fade and a new nation takes its place. The cycle of history goes on: War with its sorrow, peace in its beauty that never lives a full life. History prompts us to ask questions in regard to man's relationship with his fellow man. It also makes us interested in the creature, man, who does and has done the things that history records. The most important aspect of history is not the dates and events themselves but the why and cause of events.

In the social sciences we study the structure of government and how it functions. In an indirect manner, we also study other group social organizations. Later on, we are introduced to the study of the most fascinating of God's creatures, man. What is Man?
