Louis Quijada, a native of Caracas, Venezuela, left Aruba on Sunday, November 29 and arrived by way of New York on December 1. We had hoped that he would arrive for the beginning of the school year, but the time needed in obtaining all the information and the precious passport resulted in his arrival about three weeks previous to the ending of first semester. These last weeks became an orientation and preparation for the second semester.

Since Louis plans to go into engineering, he is loaded down with physics, algebra, geometry, biology, and English. He enjoys school work and finds the American system not particularly hard.

Adjustment to the American setting was quickly made. However, he did miss the warmth and the spices of his southland home. In Aruba when the temperature falls to 80°, the students come to school in sweaters; here they take them off.

The senior has been an Ok guy. We have enjoyed his friendly company.
