

Early in October we began work on the yearbook. Many new ideas were thrown around and considered. The first word that became sacred to us was "different." This year we must aim to be as different as possible. The last word that had greatest ability to move eager hearts was "deadline."

In between difference and deadline, much was known to happen. Work progressed smoothly, but, well, some people will always remember lights and locked doors that weren't exactly locked. Most of the work was done in the Rouser Room of the Hill Building.

Problems, yes, they did appear and their appearance became rather familiar as time went on, but there were none so big that three heads as a group could not solve.

The staff revealed people with a lot of talents and interests. It was a good staff.

There was Joey's indispensable typing and erasing skill plus faithfulness to burn the midnight oil. Dick's great concern over senior individuals paid off when the pages were successfully completed. Eric's new knowledge of photography is displayed throughout the book. Another of the up and coming juniors, Stuart, was recognized by his confidence in layout and other problems that arose. There was Jane's bewilderment and the industrious senior boys. Norma, Sandra Kay and Ethelyn, well, they talked a lot. The assistance of Louis Quijada was appreciated.

Never to be forgotten is the trouble we had in taking a good band picture, the shortage of pencils and erasers, and the welcome cooperation of all members of Aggie Board. Without them the annual could never have been completed.

We are especially grateful to Mr. Field for his patience, ambition, and his great determination to meet our deadlines and complete the Aggie on time and in proper form.

Well, it came to pass that the last few days before the deadline saw some of us staying the weekend, eyes a little more bloodshot, and tests, the next morning's horror. But we somehow made everything come out all right and now we have what we hope is a fine yearbook.

Thanks to all you willing staff members.
