

In Memoriam

Few men have become more widely known or highly respected within agricultural circles than the late Theodore H. Fenske. He had been associate dean of the Institute of Agriculture, University of Minnesota, since 1956. He died March 28, 1963.

Farm groups of all descriptions, church groups, industrial groups, service clubs, high school superintendents, and college presidents sought his services as a speaker. Members of the State Legislature valued his counsel. His unusual capacity to handle a staggering load of complex administrative details was respected by his colleagues.

The agricultural enterprise of the State of Minnesota will long enjoy the fruits of his labors.

May we, who are privileged to remain, be able to contribute in a like measure to the building of this state and nation--Especially, may we, as did T. H. Fenske, stand for those principles which build men.
