

Day To Remember: June 12, 1970

In brief, impressive ceremonies on a sunny June 12, the college conferred the Associate in Applied Science degree on ninety-nine graduates. The commencement speaker, Dr. Stanley B. Kegler, stressed the need for dedication in solving the nation's problems and assuring its survival. He classified many of today's citizens as "uncritical lovers" who can see nothing that needs correction and improvement in American society. Others, he said, are "unloving critics" who can see nothing good in it and would destroy everything. What we need, the University administrator declared, are "critical lovers", persons who observe the flaws and seek to do something to eliminate them because they love their country and all that it stands for.

The academic procession was led by Dr. Olaf Soine, mace bearer, and Marshals David Stoppel and Herschel Lysaker. Dr Stanley Kegler, associate vice president for coordinate campuses and educational relationships, (LEFT) delivered the commencement address.
